SIX MILLION GERMS PER FLY.
One of Nature's Masterpieces For Spreading Fatal Diseases.
Regarded as a contrivance for disseminating the germs of fatal diseases, the fly is one of nature's masterpieces. A fairly large bacterium is much smaller than a fly than a fly is smaller than an elephant. The microbes of many of our ordinary contagious disorders are a thousand times more minute than this. The insect, moreover, is equipped with spines, hairs, folds, cavities and projections innumerable for microbes to cling to. In addition, each of its six little feet has the sticky pad which we used to call a sucker, adhesive enough to hold the fly on a window pane, and therefore just the thing for picking up germs by the hundred. One may well credit reports of a single fly, filthy from a swill barrel and loaded with 382,000 bacteria of one species alone. Moreover, the fly, living on infected food, takes the microbes into its own digestive tract, carries them about for days, and deposits them by thousands in the "fly-specks." There, for example, bacillus tuberculosis may live for two weeks.
It would be bad enough if the fly merely crawled about in the sputum of a tuberculosis patient or the debris of a case of typhoid, and then simply infected the food on the way to their mouths. It does worse than this; it starts a culture of the deadly germs in the food which we eat tomorrow, and by the time tomorrow arrives the single microbe has become a thousand.
"Here is a sample of a class of facts which may well give pater familias pause. At one of the Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Stations, by way of finding out how many bacteria a fly can transfer to a milk jar, they tried shaking up flies in sterilized water and estimating the numbers washed off. The record number was 118,800,000 from 18 individuals, or more than 6,500,000 apiece.
Almost overnight, we are beginning to realize where the fly is born and bred, and where his travels take him, and what it is he washes off into the milk. Certain facts are coming to light that are calculated to make the householder sit up and take notice. Breast-fed babies, for instance, are exposed to dangers through air and water, but not through their food, and they die, at the worst, a third faster during fly-time. "Bottle" babies die three and four times faster.
But, after all, one does not need statistics to make them suspicious of the fly, for even such painstaking studies as that of Daniel D. Jackson, of New York city, who by means of fly-traps placed in various places, showed a remarkably close coincidence between the prevalence of flies and the onset of fatal cases of typhoid fever. The convincing evidence is that flies have been caught with the germs.
It is an old device, almost as old as the science of bacteriology, to let a fly crawl about on a sterilized plate of nutritive gelatin such as is commonly employed for growing cultures of bacteria. At first there is no sign; but, after a few hours in the incubator the insect's track on the gelatin is outlined in flourishing colonies of microbes. Virtually every time the fly has put down one of his six feet, he has planted at least one germ. A march of one inch results in a hundred vigorous cultures.
It is a pretty clean fly that does not bear 1,000 germs. A fairly dirty one will carry 50,000. A fly just back from the swill-pail or pig-pen, at the height of the season for flies and germs, carries a load approaching the record number in a drop of city milk—and this is well into the millions.—McClure's Magazine.

Prussia's People's Forest.
There are 20,000,000 acres of pine-garden forest standing in Prussia today. Half of it belongs to the people in common, either to the state or to the villages. It paid 40 years ago an average profit of 80 cents an acre per year. Today it pays $1.65 an acre. In 20 years, when it is more mature, it will pay $3.00 an acre, net profit, and, in addition to its protective value, will return, from the common forest alone, an income of $30,000,000 a year to the people. It furnishes all the firewood and small lumber of Prussia, paper stock, and other invaluable materials, besides protecting the streams and holding down and improving the land.—Everybody's Magazine.
